TURKEY BREEDERS

Don't use a hit or miss method when you're selecting breeders for your turkey flock.

R. H. Burtner, poultry specialist at VPI, says driving young turkeys into your breeding pen and stopping when you have as many as you want, is the worst way to select breeding stock.

Virginia can't regain its leadership in turkey production as long as growers use this technique.

Burtner says to look at it from a pocketbook standpoint. Select breeders for feed efficiency, uniformity of weight, meaty conformation, and ruggedness.

Keep records so you will know the flockss that are best feed. Select a samples of birds from tach flock and weigh them so you'll know which flock has made the best gains during the growing period.

After determining the average weight and feed conversion of your best flocks, weed out those that don't measure up. Select at least 10 per cent of the highest rated females and 2 per cent of the top mals.

COWS VARY IN ABILITY TO PRODUCE PROTEIN

Cows produce protein. This has been known for a long time, Not so well known, perhaps, is the fact that cows differ in their ability to produce protein.

Dr. N. R. Thompson, dairy scientist at V P I, says some cows put more protein in their milk than do others. He believes the difference may be partly traced to heredity. Environmental influences, such as feed and management, may have some effect.

Dr. Thompson says if a cow gives 1,000 pounds of milk and the milk contains 3 percent protein, then she yields 30 pounds of protein a month. A quart of this milk would contain 29 grams of protein, or almost half the amount recommended for an adult to have in his diet each day.
